AIM

Labour policies, institutions, and labour market outcomes are deeply rooted in historical processes, and they are shaped over time by social, economic and political changes. Understanding contemporary labour challenges, including informality, platform work, migration, social security, and labour regulation, requires a long-term perspective that combines history, policy analysis, and empirical research methods. This programme is framed in a broader, policy-relevant framework, while retaining rigorous historical and qualitative research techniques. It equips participants to link historical insights with present-day labour market challenges.

OBJECTIVES

- Understand the historical evolution of labour policies and institutions over time in India and other countries
- Map the changing World of Work over time, linking past transitions to contemporary labour market challenges.
- Introduce interdisciplinary research methods and analytical skills for studying labour policy, labour markets, and institutions.
- Familiarise participants with diverse sources such as archival records, official documents, institutional reports, and labour legislation.
- Build capacity in documenting the undocumented, with a focus on oral history, workers' narratives, and informal labour.

COURSE PROFILE

Historical development of labour policy and labour market regulation, Growth and transformation of labour institutions and the role of the state, Relationship between labour history and labour policy, Formal and informal work across different time periods, Historical, qualitative, and policy-oriented research methods. Use of archival, official, and institutional sources, Oral history methods and workers' lived experiences, Case studies on labour reforms, labour movements, and institutional change.

METHODOLOGY

Classroom lectures, thematic discussions, Group work and case study analysis, Interaction with policy practitioners, and subject experts.

PARTICIPATION

Research scholars, Young teachers from universities, colleges, and research institutions, Professionals and practitioners from government departments, research organisations, and labour-related institutions.
