FROM THE DIRECTOR GENERAL’S DESK

Towards an Equitable Agenda for Global Labour Mobility

International labour mobility is one of the central dimensions of the current phase of globalisation. The stock of international migrants in 2010 is estimated to be around 214 million, a significant share among them moving out of their country of origin for employment. Not only has labour mobility increased in magnitude, it has also become heterogeneous in terms of both its direction and composition. In the coming years, due to the ageing of the population, mismatch between demand and supply of skills, and the expanding role of the migration industry, the global migration landscape is all set to become more complex.

From a policy perspective what requires immediate attention is the wide range of insecurities confronted by migrants. Factors operating at multiple levels are responsible for this situation. Firstly, in most of the countries administrative and legal structures required to facilitate migration to new and emerging destinations, or to meet the requirements of different categories of migrants continue to be rudimentary. Secondly, both high and low skilled migrants are governed by stringent polices, in fact ‘internal controls’, like detention, expulsion and exclusion from work and welfare, are increasingly resorted to, along with border controls, to restrict migration. Thirdly, when host countries experience difficult economic situations, as in the case of the recent global economic slowdown, the right to migrate and rights of migrants are adversely affected.

The complexity of the problem becomes clear when one considers that international migrants encounter varying degrees of difficulties in being part of the social security systems in both origin and host countries and also have limited access to inform social support networks. The importance of this is underlined when we consider the increase noted in the migration of low skilled workers with a temporary status, with varying degrees of difficulties in being part of the social security systems in both origin and host countries— are largely excluded from its coverage. No doubt, unilateral responses by countries of origin and destination to enhance social security concerns of international migrant workers are important. In this context schemes in India that provide insurance coverage to international labour migrants like Pravasi Bharatiya Bima Yojana (PBBY) and Mahatma Gandhi Pravasi Suraksha Yojana (MGPSY) deserves special mention. Other formal means of enhancing workers’ welfare; signing Memorandums of Understanding with major destination countries, followed by Indian Government, has also proved to be beneficial to migrant workers.

Greater cooperation and dialogue between countries of origin and destination towards managing migration is essential to protect migrants’ rights, including their social security rights. This may entail making national laws and policies as per the stipulations suggested in the international instruments, formulating multilateral and bilateral agreements considering the changing intricacies of the current population movements.
A panel discussion on the book “Human Bondage: Tracing its Roots in India” was organised at V. V. Giri National Labour Institute on 13 September, 2013. The panelists were Shri Bhuwan Ribhu, National Secretary, Bachpan Bachao Andolan; Shri P. S. Krishnan; Mr. Coen Kompier, Senior Specialist, ILO; Mr. Abhay Xaxa, Research Scholar, JNU and Prof. S.C. Srivastava, Secretary General, National Labour Law Association. The author of the book, Dr. L.D. Mishra was the moderator of the Panel Discussion. The panel discussion started with the opening remarks by Dr. Lakshmidhar Mishra, wherein he mentioned that the human relationship at workplace should be determined by dignity. On bonded labourers, he explained that being the victims of socio-economic exploitative structure, they have eyes to see and ears to hear but no tongue to speak. They need sustained external help and it is therefore important to develop a countervailing social force to address the situation. On social discrimination against the vulnerable sections of population from where a substantial proportion of bonded labour emerge, he quoted from the writings of Jyotibhai Phule “You can divide the places of worship, but not the human beings”. Workers can be raised to great heights through functional literacy and enhancing their capacity to bargain collectively and individually. He also quoted from the expression of the bonded labour “I go in darkness, I come in darkness, my life is full of darkness”. He further quoted that “the man who does not stand up to question injustice is the man who dies within”. Dr. Helen R. Sekar, Senior Fellow, coordinated this programme.

Centre for Gender and Labour has been set up with the objective of addressing and strengthening the understanding of gender issues in the labour market. With market reforms, such issues have occupied an important dimension of research. Women suffer multiple disadvantages in terms of access to labour markets, and often do not have the same level of freedom as men, to access the labour market. Gender gap in labour force participation rates and unemployment rates are persistent features of global labour markets. Gender inequality remains an issue within labour markets globally. These issues need to be addressed to ensure gender equality in the labour market, which requires concerted efforts both at academic and policy levels.

Within this framework the activities of the centre are thus envisaged to upgrade the status of the institute to a leading institute in the area of research, education, training and advocacy on gender and women’s labour in particular. Further, the centre is visualized to act as an apex repository of documents and data on women labour and as an interactive forum for experts and activists in the field, in order to enhance understanding of gender and women labour issues. Initiatives on skill development, capacity building, consciousness raising, social dialogue and empowerment through micro-credit and self-help groups are some of the activities of the Centre. Moreover health, a socially produced phenomenon, needs to be examined in the context of the laboring poor and women in particular, who historically have been socially and politically marginalized.

Cross-border population movement, an indispensible feature of the current phase of globalisation, has led to significant changes in the migration landscape. Factors like temporisation of labour flows, increased mobility of low and semi-skilled migrants, and rise in irregular migration have widened the range of insecurities encountered by migrants. Extending social security to migrants and their families could significantly minimise, if not wholly address, the entire gamut of insecurities during the migration cycle. While the argument seems to be most compelling for migrant workers from developing countries, often they have limited or no access to social security.

This paper aims to highlight the case for providing social security to transnational workers, considering the heterogeneity associated with labour migration flows and the corresponding increase in insecurities of migrants. It analyses international legal instruments and document good practices, at multilateral and bilateral levels, to argue for extending such initiatives particularly to workers from developing countries. Social security for migrants from India is explored to make a case.
